This book examines the changes in official policy towards the introduction of protective labor legislation for women workers in the Soviet Union during the period 1917-41. In the 1920s, emphasis was placed on the need for the "protection" of female labor by the agencies responsible for regulating womens' role in industrial production. With the mass recruitment of women workers to the Soviet industrialization drive by the early 1930s, labor protection issues were often ignored as women were encouraged to play a more "equal" role in the production process.
